Description

This is the current state of the surrealist object created by Dalí in 1933, which incorporates a number of elements reconstructed between 1970 and 1979. Dalí also identified it as an object-sculpture in his 1935 book La Conquête de l'irrationnel, and for this reason the same denomination also applies in this case to the category of this work. It was presented in June 1933 at the Pierre Colle gallery in Paris, and in October of the same year at the Salon des Surindépendants, with a second title: Abundance. The artist used various found objects that reflect the most relevant and symbolic iconography of his Surrealist period: an inkwell with the figures from Millet's The Angelus, a loaf of bread, a zootrope and some corn cobs, all mounted on a porcelain bust with ants painted on it. It is probable that the bust was originally a mannequin for wigs. Between 1934 and 1939, Dalí modified this object-sculpture by substituting and / or adding certain elements, in a series of creative acts that gave rise to unique original versions of ephemeral character.

Provenance

- [Galerie Pierre Colle, Paris, 1933-?]
- Georges Hugnet, Paris, ?-1966
- Gustave J. Nellens, Knokke-le-Zoute, 1966-1971
- Jacques J. Nellens, Knokke-le-Zoute, 1971-[1992]

Observations

In its present state this work incorporates some elements that were restored prior to its entry to MoMA in New York in 1992. The documentation makes it clear that the inkwell, the wig, the loaf of bread and the zootrope are not the original elements from 1933. Except for the wig, which is certainly a late addition, it is very likely that these new elements are very similar to the originals, replaced for reasons of conservation. It seems that the first time this work was presented in this state was at the exhibition Salvador Dalí : retrospective, 1920-1980, held at the Centre Georges Pompidou, Musée national d'art moderne in Paris between 1979 and 1980.
